The School offers a wide range of high-quality learning and research opportunities, with over 20 undergraduate courses in psychology including topics of specific interest such as criminal psychology, neuropsychology, organisational psychology, and cross-cultural psychology. School research reflects a diversity of topics in social, developmental, cognitive, biological, behavioural, cross-cultural, forensic and clinical psychology.

Our Wellington base offers excellent opportunities for academic and applied research and clinical experience in psychology. The School has excellent links with all the major mental health research and care institutions as well as senior psychologists in private practice and the public sector.

The School supports the Centre for Applied Cross-Cultural Research and the Victoria Psychology Clinic and School staff also contribute to related Victoria-based institutes – the Roy McKenzie Centre for the Study of Families, the Centre for Biodiscovery, and the Institute of Criminology – and collaborate with School of Biological Sciences staff in research on behavioural and neurobiological aspects of drug abuse.
